Dreamland to present a thrilling war drama with sensational battle scenes today, the "Battle of Pottsburg Bridge."

Kalem's long list of war pictures has received an interesting addition in the "Battle of Pottsburg Bridge," performed by the Jacksonville company and said to be the portrayal of an historical incident occurring during the Civil war.

According to the story of the picture, the bridge at Pottsburg creek is held by the federal troops who are attacked by a detachment from General Stuart's brigade. The bridge is near the home of a young Confederate soldier and, because of his knowledge of the country, he is detailed to burn it and thus destroy the Federal communications.

Discovered in his attempt, the Confederate soldier is severely wounded, and when he drifts to the landing, he is rescued by his mother, sister and sweethearts, who have been watching his efforts.

The sister then takes up the task and manages to escape the sentries and sets the bridge on fire. At the time she succeeds the opposing forces are fighting on the bridge. The Confederates blow up one end of the structure while the girl sets fire to the other end, trapping the Federals between and compelling them to jump into the water and swim out, when they are captured.

The girl drops into the water after setting the fire and makes a long swim to safety. When General Stuart visits the home of the wounded soldier to congratulate him upon the success of his venture, he learns of the bravery of the sister. This part is played by Marion Cooper, a new Kalem beauty, who proves herself to be some swimmer.

The annual convocation of Granite chapter, No. 29, B. A. M., will be held Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock. Business of importance. Work, rank of Esquire.
